Water Drop/Splash Photography

I attended a workshop on March 30, 2019 at Kenmore Camera, presented by Karl Mills. He is the developer of a product called FotoFreeze (www.fotofreez.com). This product makes the water drop process much easier because it regulates the water drops, controls the flash and fires the camera. As an introduction to the art, this made learning much simpler.

In this particular photo, milk/cream mixture was used for the medium. This makes for a thicker liquid than just plain water and changes the shape of the pillar from the first drop that plain water. The color of the milk also allows you to front light the splash. To achieve the final shape, a second drop follows the first and a collision occurs. The fun/difficult part of this is getting the timing of the second drop so that the collision occurs at the proper time. That is where the FotoFreeze product come in. It allows you to set the time intervals of the drops, flash, and camera shutter so that there is consistency from shot to shot.

Settings for this shot:

Canon 5D MarkIV

Canon EF 100mm f/2.8L Macro @f/32

Camera set to bulb mode and controlled by FotoFreez
